POISING FOR THE NUDE.

About twenty students were collected at the atelier, awaiting the arrival of the person who was to pose. A glowing stove made the place excessively warm, with a view to comfort of the expected model. As it was customary to admit only painters, X—advised me not to intimate that I did not belong to the priesthood of art, as painters, especially models, disliked the presence of Philistines—laymen being thus designated in the language of the atelier.

Presently the model arrived—a bright handsome brunette of nineteen or twenty. There was a demonstration of welcome from the painters, the door was locked, and she proceeded to assume the business-like fashion to prepare for work. When ready she mounted a platform about two feet high, where she fell under a lofty broad side-light. Two of the more advanced painters, who acted as a committee of arrangements, placed her in a posture to be assumed. Several times the two placed her and then retired a few yards to observe the effect, remarking as they did so, "Don't hold the arm so stiff," "Incline the head a trifle," and what not, accompanied with painters' pantomime, such as slowly raising the head, shutting out portions with the intercepted hand, and massing the effects with half-closed eyes. The fourth trial proved to be a success, at which a phrase of general satisfaction was expressed. The two, enjoying her not to budge, with the others, got behind their easels and went to work, some taking off their coats. One modelled in clay; with this exception all the posing was done in the air. The painter turned earnestly toward the canvas, the clay, and the model, and not a sign of dawdling or frivolity was to be seen. To them the woman was a statue. Nothing was recognized here but art; it took the form of worship, and he who looked with other eyes than those of an artist was accounted sacrilegious. Thus the public opinion of the atelier made them all artists, and if the art feeling was not possessed, it was assumed.

After a time the silence was broken by requesting some one to heat up the stove as she was cold, which brought one or two ejaculations, and a murmur that they were already in the interior of Africa, to which she retorted that they would not think so if they in her place, and a long silence was interrupted by her asking the time, at which one of the elders remarked, "Not yet, mademoiselle." Again in a few minutes she said she was sure the time must be up. "It is, my child," answered the same elder, "three hours a day. Posture is not naturally more profitable; she received five francs for the two hours and a half to three hours she remained in the atelier, during which she posed about two hours, the remainder being taken up by the painter. The time of repose she called her entrées. Believing me to be a painter, she called my attention, in a simple, natural way, to the roundness of her arm, the texture and color of the skin, and the curved lines of her shoulders. She went on to say in a manner purely professional: "My arms and shoulders are my best points, and I occasionally pose for them; I like it much better than posing for the whole figure."

At length the painter in authority told her it was time to resume the pose, and she stepped on the platform she looked at her watch. She was posing for Cynthia, who cast the shepherd Eudymion into a deep sleep in order to kiss him. One of the painters, having acquainted her with the mythological story of the artful stealing of the ocellus, she observed that she paid very little attention to such nonsense—besides, one could not believe more than half these painters said "about such things. They fell cleverly into the posture, guided by a few directions. As they proposed to work on the face, she was instructed to wear a pleased expression. Cynthia was taken at the moment when she was advancing toward the sleeping Eudymion to smother his kisses, coy and yet impelled by sweet temptation.

"Try, my child," said the man in authority, "to imagine that the young man you love lies before you—with his pockets full of bank notes." This had the desired effect; the model could not help laughing, and the traces of it remained some time on her face. All fell to work again and silence was supreme, as each tried to transfer Cynthia's happy face to canvas. Once in a while, when through lassitude or forgetfulness she modified the posture, papa—the elder painter—said to her sharply, "Mademoiselle, pay attention!" which showed that, however much license was allowed during the rests, rigid discipline was exacted in time of work.

When she got through, she made her toilet in the same business-like way that she had made it. She asked for a looking-glass to correct it, but the model could not at once be found. "What savages!" twenty men and not one mirror. But I am not surprised at it; you are such monsters you are afraid to look at yourself. As Frenchmen like to be called monsters by the women, this was taken as a general compliment. At length a cracked mirror—poetically styled surmel—was produced, before which she smoothed out her plumage like a bird in the sun. Her attire was simple: a sombre colored little hat, black alpaca robe, dark brown mantle, closely fitting gloves and boots and a parasol in hand comprised her costume. Equipped, she had the demeanor of a rosière of Nantes, or a country girl. The five franc piece was handed to her enveloped in paper, a mark of decency. After making an appointment for another day, she passed out with a modest, quiet air amidst a general chorus of adieu. The painters of this atelier were composed of both sexes, working together apparently without difficulty. Six or seven women were present, two of whom were Americans. On making the acquaintance of one of the latter she observed:

"Some of our countrymen find an impropriety in our working in a mixed atelier, and perhaps there is, according to society's code; but if a woman wants to be a painter, she must get over her squeamishness; if she wants to paint strong and well like a man, she must go through the same training. The trial to a modest young woman is at first great; but as soon as she is possessed of the art feeling, the first impression which she

on entering the atelier wears away, and she is absorbed in her work like those around her. There is no sex here; the students, men and women, are simply painters. In the atelier, excessive modesty in a woman painter is a sign of mediocrity; only the woman who forgets the conventionalities of society in the pursuit of art stands a chance of distinction. If the woman has not a desire, an enthusiasm to profit by the advantages of the atelier, she had better never touch paint or pencil. This is one of the best ateliers in Paris to learn to paint in, and this is a sufficient reason for our coming here. Society can do no more be governed by the rules of art, than the atelier can be governed by the rules of society. If Rosa Bonheur had occupied her time looking after proprieties she would not stand where she does to-day. There was something almost defiant in the remarks of the young woman, as if she held a position that required defiance. What she said, too left an impression that she had broken many lances in maintaining her own what is regarded as debatable ground.—Albert Rhodes, in July Galaxy.

The Royal Family of Sweden and the Newly Anointed King.

THE FAMILY OF BERNADOTTE. The man who is to be crowned to-day King of Sweden, "as well as of the Goths and the Vandals," and the woman, his wife, who is to be crowned Queen, are Oscar Frederick Bernadotte, and Sophia, a Princess of Nassau. He is a young man, thirty-two years of age, and is forty-four years younger. His wife is seven years younger. His brother was the late King, and left no child, but one daughter, who is Crown Princess of Denmark. He is a grandson of the famous Bernadotte, Napoleon's Marshal, and great-grandson of Bernadotte who lived a humble tradesman's life in Pau, under the shadow of the castle of Henry of Navarre. This famous Bernadotte, the grandfather, was a Red Republican, and left his home to make war upon the coalition of tyrants against whom Danton was thundering. He joined the French ranks with a musket and chanted the "Marseillaise," like the rest of them, and probably had no shoes and very little to eat. But as this is an army in which every soldier was said to carry a field Marshal's baton in his knapsack, and as in time it came to be commanded by one Napoleon Bonaparte, Bernadotte attained great honors. He married the daughter of a French nobleman, and his wife was a Princess, Republican as he was. But he did not continue well with Napoleon. Some say the great Emperor was unjust to him and meanly deprived him of his glory. His program he disclosed, and he was so much that he was exiled by name in a general order of the day. It happened that a body of Swedish prisoners came into his hands. He was kind to them. The fame of his kindness spread through the ranks, and the King, who on the throne had no heir, who should be his heir but Bernadotte? He was a Prince and a famous man of war. Napoleon furiously opposed his accepting the dignity; but he accepted it, was elected Crown Prince and became co-regent of the Swedish empire. When the coalition against Napoleon was made he joined it, assurance being given that he could retain his crown in spite of his father's calling him to "Sire, my brother," the heavenly George, King of the Swedes. In the overthrow of his old chief he bore an important part, and in 1818, when Napoleon was chafing his bitter life away at St. Helena and quarreling with his keeper about his wine, his title and all at once, like a comet, Bernadotte ascended the throne of Gustavus Adolphus as Charles XIV., and was acknowledged "Sire, my brother," by the crowned heads of the Holy Alliance.

THE LATE KING AND HIS MISSION. Bernadotte was in his fifty-fifth year when he attained this supreme, sublime felicity, and his republican head was "crowned with a glorious crown." He reigned many years, and did a very old man, even fourscore. He was a good, sensible king. So likewise his son, who, oddly enough, married the daughter of Eugene Beauharnais, son of Josephine and the adopted son of Napoleon. This lady still lives and is called Queen Dowager, and was first cousin to the late Emperor of the French. So that until Sedan history—and shall we say also God's own beautiful and sweet justice—showed two throngs of royal blood descending from the divorced and discarded Josephine to two houses of the line of the abandoned Beauharnais. This son, Oscar—his royal name Oscar I.—died in 1859, and his son succeeded as Charles XV. Charles was very French—fond of painting, of coins, and specimens of firearms, and of chess and wine and women, with a black, swarthy, eager face—some traces of the Creole blood which his grandmother, Josephine, brought from the West Indies. I remember him well, as used to see him, two summers since, in his beautiful summer palace of Drottningholm, just beyond the town, on beautiful Zofen, one of the loveliest islands of this charming Lake Malar. He was a restless, unhappy soul, and wrote poems and painted landscapes. He came to this prosy theme with a "mission." He would unite three kingdoms; he would make a great Scandinavia; the three crowns would be one crown; he would rule over the North, and he would be the father of the King of the North, and Gustavus Adolphus, and be a king worthy of the seat of Odin and of the golden time when the "Norwegian banners floated the skies of Scotland and France in every nation and sign and name. His voice would be heard in Europe, and assist Napoleon and the other leaders in the business of peace and war. So he took to drilling and military exercises, his brain much inflamed with the idea of a Scandinavian empire, and he would be the father of the King of the North, and Gustavus Adolphus, and be a king worthy of the seat of Odin and of the golden time when the "Norwegian banners floated the skies of Scotland and France in every nation and sign and name.
